College, the military or a new career? Seniors had so many options to choose from after they graduated from high school.

Armando Chavez ('19), for example, looked forward to starting a career in construction. To pursue this career, he looked into potential colleges for that field. "I'm considering Scott Community College or maybe Iowa because I want to be a welder," Chavez said. Students could take welding classes and other trade skills courses while still at Central to gain skills in fields that they were interested in for future career options.

Despite high school ending, senior students did not have to say goodbye to their favorite sports. Victor Howard ('19), a student athlete, looked forward to college athletics, saying, "I want to go to Michigan State University because of their basketball team or maybe UCLA because California has nice weather."

With their final year coming to a close, seniors looked back at their successes and struggles, but some seniors breezed through their last year with some of their easiest classes in high school. Mary Dammad ('19) said, "I finished all of my hard classes, and this year I have an easy schedule."

As seniors prepared to graduate, they gave younger students advice about how to succeed. "My advice would be to always stay on top of things and turn all of your work in because 50% is better than 0%," said Jaelyn Cline ('19).

Despite that bittersweet feeling of high school coming to an end, these students felt prepared for adulthood and life after graduation. (M. Page Smith and M. Carrillo Torres)

Marshall Maniacs At the boys basketball game against Assumption, the student section cheers on the players. Members of the student section dressed up in Christmas sweaters and outfits for this game on Dec. 18. "My favorite part of being in the student section is that it makes you feel apart of the game, in a way, and it gives you another reason to pay attention and cheer your team on to get the win," Zak Linze ('19) said. "I'll miss my conversations with Mr. Rangel in the morning."

"I'll miss the school spirit the most."
-Keema Simmons ('19)

"I will miss the friendships I made through clubs and extra-curricular activities."
