Young bull riders face a dangerous sport

Weekends provided an opportunity to ride bulls for twins Ryan Grace 23 and Zachary Grace 23 at a young age.

"When I was two, I was riding sheep. Starting off littler helped me a lot, and it was a good start instead of just hopping into bull riding," Zachary said.

Knowledge of the sport helped assist the brothers on their rides.

"The more experience you have, the easier it is. You don't have to think about it as much; it's more natural," Ryan said. "Everything is rushing through your head. [You're] trying to stay focused and keep all the basics in your mind."

However, no matter how skilled and experienced, unexpected events still occurred.

Ryan said, "I'm not afraid because I'm used to it, but when I got hung up and dragged underneath the bull, I was worried. You go off the wrong side of the bull, and you can't get your hand out of the rope, so it drags you along until the bull fighters pull it out for you."

For Zachary, practice always allowed him to remain composed enough to finish his rides.

"When you get off the bull, you gotta run. If you get in his face, he'll run you over." Zachary said. "The adrenaline is pumping. You put your hand in the rope and you ride."
