By the time the end of the year came around, the students who left the building were not the same ones who entered that previous fall. Not only did they look slightly different (usually from gaining a couple inches in height), but inside they were different too.

Before, Caitlon Tellin 14 described herself as shy, but she realized she had no reason to be afraid. She made it her goal to be more outgoing, and she succeeded.

The acceptance of fellow peers grew, and their abilities to truly be themselves bounded over all expectations they had initially set.

Previously, Allison Jensen 17 had not always made an effort to get to know new students. However, when Carma Armstrong 17 came and joined the cross country team, Allison went out of her way and made Carma feel welcomed.

We matured with the knowledge that to stand out was not a bad thing or that a commotion had to be caused to become the center of someone's attention. At times it meant we simply did the right thing.

Anna Hagen 15 became a vacation bible school teacher last summer in Chicago, and every day she was shown that she stood out and played a big role in these children's lives.

Throughout this book documenting our year, we discovered story after story of how each of us stood out, but that does not need to stop just because these pages have. This school year has now come to a close, but we can still ask ourselves: what are we doing today to Stand Out?
